7:Lesseps T-3 (1787-88)1790 Kamchadal

317 but objects cannot be seen through them.
342 The leaves of talc are more clear, and approach nearer to glass; in the mean time they are not sufficiently transparent for persons without to see what is going on within: this is manifestly no inconvenience to such low houses.

622 Every ostrog is presided by a chief, called 554 toyon. This kind of magistrate is chosen
R from among the natives of the country,
177 by a plurality of voices. The Russians
.62 have preserved to them this priviledge, but the election must be approved by the jurisdiction of the province. This toyon is merely a peasant, like those whom he judges and governs; he has no mark of distinction, and performs the same labours as his subordinates. His office is chiefly to watch over the police, and inspect the execution of the orders of government. Under him is another Kamtschadale, chosen